AUGUST 5, 1756. [Numb. 1154.]

SOUTH-CAROLINA Gazette.

From the ANTIGUA Gazette, May 29, 1756.

THE following account of the taking of his majesty's ship the Warwick by 3 French men of war, may be depended upon to be true in every particular, and is published to do justice to Capt. Shuldham, (whose conduct and courage has been long ago fully experienced) as well as to his officers and men.

On the 11th of March, by break of day, the Warwick descried 3 sail, to which she immediately gave chace: Upon coming near them, they were soon discovered to be ships of war, one particularly looming extreamly large: As they did not answer the Warwick's signal, she being certain of their great superiority stood from them, but in vain; for, as they were all prime sailors they soon came up with her. The Atalanta, a frigate of 38 guns first fired one gun, which the Warwick returned with a broadside: Tho' the Atalanta was at first to windward she soon ranged under the Warwick's lee quarter, by which means she avoided her lower tier, for, upon the Warwick's running out the lower deckers, the sea rushed in with such impetuosity, that she was obliged to close all the ports before the mainmast: However, tho' the Warwick could bring but 6 of her lower deckers to bear against her, yet, from the continual fire of the upper tier, as well as that of the marines commanded by Capt. Brough (who all behaved with the utmost spirit, and could scarce be prevailed upon to kneel down) the Atalanta was obliged to sheer off: The Prudent of 74 guns and 864 men, (exclusive of a great number of officers and boys) was now within gun-shot, with whom the Warwick exchanged several broadsides: By this time the Zephyre also, another ship of 34 guns was very near, and the Atalanta had tacked about, so that in 5 minutes the Warwick must have been in the center of 3 fires: This situation induced the captain to strike, who thro' a principle of humanity was unwilling to sacrifice the lives of so many brave fellows. There were killed on board the Atalanta 5 men, and 17 wounded, 4 of whom died of their wounds in less than a week, which is a proof that the Warwick's guns were better pointed and did much more execution than those of the enemy, who have endeavoured to conceal their loss.

From the above relation we must beg leave to observe, that the scandalous reports, lately propogated with regard to this engagement, could come only from those, who are disaffected to his majesty's person and government: From those who never pay any regard to truth or merit, when it opposes their rebellious inclinations: But being hurried away by a wicked and jacobitical zeal, take pleasure in debasing the characters of the bravest commanders, and most loyal subjects, in hopes of strengthening as well as encouraging their own profligate party.
